

Family Traditions Scale (FTS)

The Family Traditions Scale (FTS) was developed by Hamilton McCubbin and Anne Thompson (1986b) to study the role of family resistance resources in providing resiliency and stability of family life in the face of adversity. As resistance resources and adaptation resources, family traditions are important to family life, particularly in the face of adversity. Family traditions are those events, activities and practices that families have done in the past, which they are likely to continue to do and which they value and/or respect.

Example Items: "This is a tradition in our family"
